Collecting strategies 2 tips for for new collectors on finding rare coins in rolls and other By Tyler Rossi

Searching through change and coin-roll hunting can be an interesting and accessible entry into the hobby of coin collecting. I have probably searched through $5,000 to $10,000 worth of coins over the years as part of my coin-roll hunting hobby. Over time, I've learned to quickly spot coins that are worth more than face value.Using them, I've found a Henning's nickel, an almost fully delaminated quarter, a number of blank Lincoln cent planchets, and a small amount of discontinued silver coinage. As an added benefit of searching coins, when you purchase rolls of coins from a bank or receive a handful of change from a store clerk you are technically not losing any money since you can always deposit the ones you don't want in a bank or spend them. First, if you're looking for silver, then you will mainly be searching through dimes, quarters, and half dollars. But let me say from experience that there's very little left in circulation. But there are nice pre-1964 pieces out there to find. save time, look at the edges; this is definitely easier than checking the date on each coin. On all modern circulating clad coinage, the copper core can be seen on the edges. Therefore, if the edge is entirely "silver" colored, then the coin is either silver or foreign. If you are looking through Jefferson nickels, always look for the mint mark. If it's on the reverse, over Monticello, then it's a 35% silver so-called "War nickel". On Lincoln cents, look for good condition Wheat cents, any 1955s (they can potentially be a Doubled Die Obverse (DDO) error), early (pre-1930) Wheat cents, and steel World War 2 pieces. In addition to those general rules, I always make sure to keep an eye out for glaring errors. If dramatic enough (coins with clipped planchets, lamination errors, coins that are struck off-center, etc.), they can be worth a premium. For example, I sold roughly 75% delaminated obverse for over $30! A Image: .Additionally, you should be on the lookout for knocking about circulation. While much rarer today, the Washington quarter I found with a (collector looks up the value of a Mercury Dime.) any discontinued coins that are still it is still possible to find Buffalo and Shield nickels, Mercury dimes, Standing Liberty quarters, or Indian Head cents. As they say, the odds are very low but not zero. For one, I have found relatively nice examples of all these while coin roll hunting.Of course, some coins are worth much more than others. So, in my experience, what are the top five coins worth more than face value still to be found in pocket change? There are so many that I'll talk about larger categories than individual coin types. The first category includes any high-grade or Proof coins that have nice eye appeal. It's almost impossible to find a truly Mint State coin while coin-roll hunting. But there will be a large (1985-S Lincoln Cent in Proof. Image) number on the edge of MS. If you are lucky, either the coins will have come from a brand new original mint wrapper, that was full of freshly minted coins or from someone who was dumping a collection into circulation. Both are distinct possibilities, and I have found examples of each. The second portion of this category, Proof coinage, is rarely found in circulation. When Proof coins do pop up, they are often dumped from someone's collection. This often happens

When a deceased family member and doesn't know their value. Take this as a cautionary tale: even if you don't want to tell anyone what you spent, you should keep accurate, up-to-date records. 1985-S Lincoln Cent in Proof. Image:, Mint State and Proof coinage becomes damaged through circulation very quickly and will lose most (if not all) of its value in a short amount of time. Snap it up when you find it! The second category is one that I've already mentioned, and it is any coin with a discontinued design. While at this point most examples are quite worn and will only be worth between $1 and $5, you can still get lucky and find a piece in a nicer grade worth much more. While the average life span of a circulating coin is 30 years, that is only an average. I've found numerous 100year-old coins while coin-roll hunting – and even in my change. Plus, if a coin sits in some form of storage and is out of circulation for years before returning to public hands, it can reappear in surprisingly good condition. While it is rather unlikely that you'll find a rare type of mintage, you can definitely find Buffalo nickels, Mercury dimes, Standing Liberty quarters, and Indian head cents worth between $5-$25 or more apiece.Next, I suggest you pull any older, pre-1930 Wheat cents that you find. As these are reaching their 100th year, there aren't many in good condition to be found in circulation. However, most will sell for between 25 and 50 cents in local coin shops. Slightly higher grade, yet still circulated, examples can fetch between $1 and $5. Fourth on my list is all 90% silver coinage. These are dimes, quarters, and half dollars struck prior to 1964 when the United States introduced clad coinage. In my personal experience, rolls of dimes produce dramatically more silver than rolls of quarters but slightly less than halves. However, it is much harder to locate half dollars (1964-D Kennedy Half Dollar in NGC holder) because a lot of banks don't carry them in much quantity. Therefore, I suggest while finding a quarter or a half dollar is worth more individually and can provide a massive rush, if you're looking for a higher gross volume of silver then you should stick to dimes. These coins are generally not collected for their numismatic value but rather for their melt. As such, these coins are often called "Junk Silver" and bought/sold by their individually weight. When this article was written, silver was worth $20.87 per ounce. That means a junk dime is worth $1.50, a quarter $3.75, and a junk half dollar $7.50 (the later 40% silver halves are worth $3.09). That means a $1 face value of 90% junk silver should trade for roughly $15. Many dealers will purchase these for 3% to 5% below melt and sell for 3% to 5% above. The last category is error coinage. Through searching pocket change and coin rolls, you can come across numerous types of errors... For example, coins that are very slightly offcenter or with a small planchet defect. However, if you find a coin that has a dramatic error, such as a 1955 DDO Lincoln cent or an off-metal strike, it could be worth serious money. For example, the 1943 copper cent or the silver 1965 dime are each worth thousands of dollars. These extreme errors are rare but do pop up every once in a while. Among the error coins that I've found are lamination errors, off-center strikes, die clashes, blank planchets, and double-struck errors. I've made probably $500 coin-roll hunting and searching through pocket change over the years.
